

What to do before the burglar comes.

Not if he comes, but when he comes. Because, say the statistics, he's coming. Down your street. And looking for easy targets.

He's looking for easy targets because he's not a professional, as a rule. He's an amateur. And so he must find easy targets. And he does. Enough easy targets to make residential burglary one of the fastest growing crimes in recent years.

This brochure is designed to help you avoid making your home look like an easy target. There are simple, basic security measures that will make your home less inviting and, in so doing, lead the burglar to look elsewhere for an easier target.

Make your home look (and sound) occupied.

By day, leave drapes and shades in normal position — the way you have them when at home. (And don't leave easily movable valuables in sight close to windows!)

At night, leave on some inner lights — bathrooms and hallways, for example. Consider buying automatic timers that turn lamps on after dark, then off a few hours later or at dawn. These timers can turn a radio on, too, so your home sounds occupied.

Never leave garage doors open — especially with no car in sight. This is like a WELCOME sign to burglars. And closing garage doors is something to do every time you leave — even if only for just a few minutes. When leaving for longer periods, don't forget to remove easily stolen objects like a power mower, garden hose, lawn chairs, bicycles and the like from your yard and keep them safely locked up.

Be a good neighbor.

Keep an eye on your neighbor's homes, get them to do the same for you.

If you see something suspicious — movement inside when a home should be empty . . . a strange car or truck in the driveway . . . a loiterer . . . call your local law enforcement agency immediately. Make a reasonable effort to get a good description and license number — without endangering yourself. Burglars have been known to use a truck and openly carry off valuable possessions. If neighbors haven't mentioned moving, be suspicious. Police would rather you called than wished you'd called.

Install good locks...and lock them!

Many homes are guarded only by spring-latch door locks. Often these were installed before burglary became such a threat. (Also, older doors and frames may have become worn, leaving a pronounced gap that allows easier jimmying. So be sure to check them, too.) To see if you have these inadequate locks, try this test. Open your front door part way. Then push the button or twist the knob that is supposed to lock it when it is closed. Now try to push in the bolt that sticks out and would normally fit in the hole in the door frame if the door were closed. If the bolt yields, with only the resistance of a spring behind it, you have the wrong kind of lock for that door. Ask a reputable locksmith about a deadbolt lock. If there's a window in the door or close nearby, make it a double-cylinder deadbolt lock. This prevents a burglar from reaching in and releasing the lock from inside after breaking the window. Now conduct the same test on every door that opens to the outside or into the garage.

Besides good locks, it's also a good idea to have a one-way peep-hole in your front door so you can find out who's outside without opening your door to a possibly dangerous stranger.

Be sure locks and chain latches are firmly screwed into solid wood — not just into a light door jamb. The longer the screws and the longer the lock bolt the safer your home will be.

For windows, install window locks. They're inexpensive and provide some security. Another idea is to get wedge devices that prevent windows from being opened, or allow you to open them an inch or two for ventilation but prevent opening them wider. Sliding glass doors need through-frame pins or grips that prevent lifting the door out of its channel.

Remember — the best lock in the world is worthless if it isn't locked. Always lock up — even if you're away from home only minutes. Houses have been cleaned out while the owner was mowing his lawn or visiting with a neighbor.

Change locks at the drop of a threat.

Any reputable locksmith can change the tumblers in your outside door locks quickly and inexpensively. So when you move into a home or apartment, have it done. If you lose a key . . . change the lock tumblers.

Don't be generous in passing around extra keys. One might end up in the hands of someone you don't trust. Don't leave an "emergency" key under the door mat, on top of the door frame, or in any other "hiding spot" so well-known to burglars.

Keep car keys and house keys separate. This way your house keys are never left in the possession of a stranger when you park your car at a restaurant or parking lot.

Never have a name or license tag attached to your house keys. If keys are lost or stolen you'll have an unwelcome visitor very quickly!

Don't welcome burglars by telephone!

Burglars often try to find out if anyone's home by phoning. If you get several suspicious "wrong number" calls or "nobody-at-the-other-end" calls, tell the police. Warn family members, especially children, to give out no information by phone—especially about who is home, who is out, how long anyone is expected to be out.

Make it harder for burglars to "case" your home by phone by avoiding names on mailboxes or on doors. Your name on display only makes it easier for the burglar to look your number up in the directory.

Don't open your door to anyone with no business inside.

This isn't just to guard against robbery by force or threat of force; sometimes burglars who have no intention of using force will first try to get in under some pretext so they can scout out valuables and study locks, windows and other means of entry. Ask repairmen and others who claim to have business inside to show positive identification. A chain latch offers little protection against an intruder. If you have the slightest doubt, telephone their superiors back at work, getting the number from your directory. If you wish to help a lost or stranded motorist or deliveryman, you make the call while he waits outside.

When you do admit a workman or a salesperson you were expecting, do not leave them alone at any time.

Don't reward the burglar who does get in.

If, despite your precautions, a burglar does get into your home, don't give him a "bonus" of cash or easily-carried jewelry. Never keep large sums of cash around the house. Keep valuable jewelry that you don't often use in a safe deposit box.

Man's best friend is an automatic burglar alarm.

Keep a dog at your house if you can. Your dog needn't be big or ferocious. If he makes noise (and most dogs will) that's enough to cause a burglar to look for easier — and quieter — pickings.

Don't advertise your vacation plans.

Spread the word to one person—a trusted neighbor who can keep an eye on things while you're gone. And let newspaper mention of your trip be confined to details after the fact.

When gone, stop newspapers and other deliveries. Or, have a good neighbor pick up papers and mail for you.

Arrange to have the lawn mowed and walks shoveled.

Tell the police or sheriff

If you'll be away from your home for an extended time, tell your law enforcement department. No, they won't put a guard at your door — no police system in the country has manpower enough to do that for every vacationer. But they will take runs past your home from time to time, alert for signs of suspicious activity. And every extra precaution helps.

Join Operation Identification

Operation Identification has effectively reduced burglary wherever it has been properly implemented. Your valuable property is marked with your Permanent Identification Number and a window sticker warns would-be burglars of the risk of entering your home. Call your police or sheriff about Operation Identification.

Will these precautions, the tips given here, guarantee your home to be burglar-safe? No, short of making your home into an armed fortress, there's no way to do that. But these basic security precautions will make your home less inviting as a target. And that's the whole idea! So share them with friends and neighbors.
